After ten years of stalemate between Troy and the Greeks, Odysseus devised the scheme to hide an elite force inside a wooden horse (called the Trojan horse) and have the rest of the Greek army pretend to sail away. The people of Troy accepted the horse into the walled city and had a feast to celebrate their victory. While the feast was happening the soldiers came out of the horse and opened the city gates to let in the rest of the army that had returned when it was dark. The Greek army won the war that night.
