Agile mountain-dwelling antelopes do your best to avoid wire snares in their rocky habitats.
	05	Initial Snares: Select four players (Cubs) to stand at opposite points along an imaginary circular boundary. Each pair holds hands high to form a "snare" arch. The Klipspringers: The rest of the group line up as a herd of agile klipspringers ready to leap and run around the circle, passing directly through each snare arch. The Catch: When the leader blows the whistle, the snares drop their arms to catch any passing klipspringer. Expanding the Snares: Any klipspringers caught in the net must pair up, raise their hands, and form a new snare arch along the circle. Odd-Man-Out: If a single klipspringer is caught without a pair, they wait briefly in the center—the next captured klipspringer will join them to form the next arch. Objective: Play continues until all klipspringers have been caught and converted into snare arches. STEAM Learning Moment (Debrief / Science Connection):	Whistle Example of a snare	Amber
Wire snares set in nature reserve boundaries trap animals indiscriminately. Conservation engineers design anti-poaching camera traps, acoustic snare detectors, and GPS collars to track and protect vulnerable wildlife like klipspringers.

Purpose of the buddy system It is an effective way to help manage the safety of large groups.

- If a person is alone, no one may notice if they go missing or have trouble. With two or more together, someone will notice and be able to help.
- It reinforces the character development trait, provides responsibility, and promotes friendships.

How to do it properly Have at least one buddy or partner with you when on water or hiking. A buddy team may consist of three Scouts when necessary, if there is an odd number in a group. When hiking, a minimum group of 4 is required, split into pairs.

- Buddies should know each other and be comfortable together.
- Your buddy should be of similar age, ability (e.g. hiking or swimming ability) and maturity .

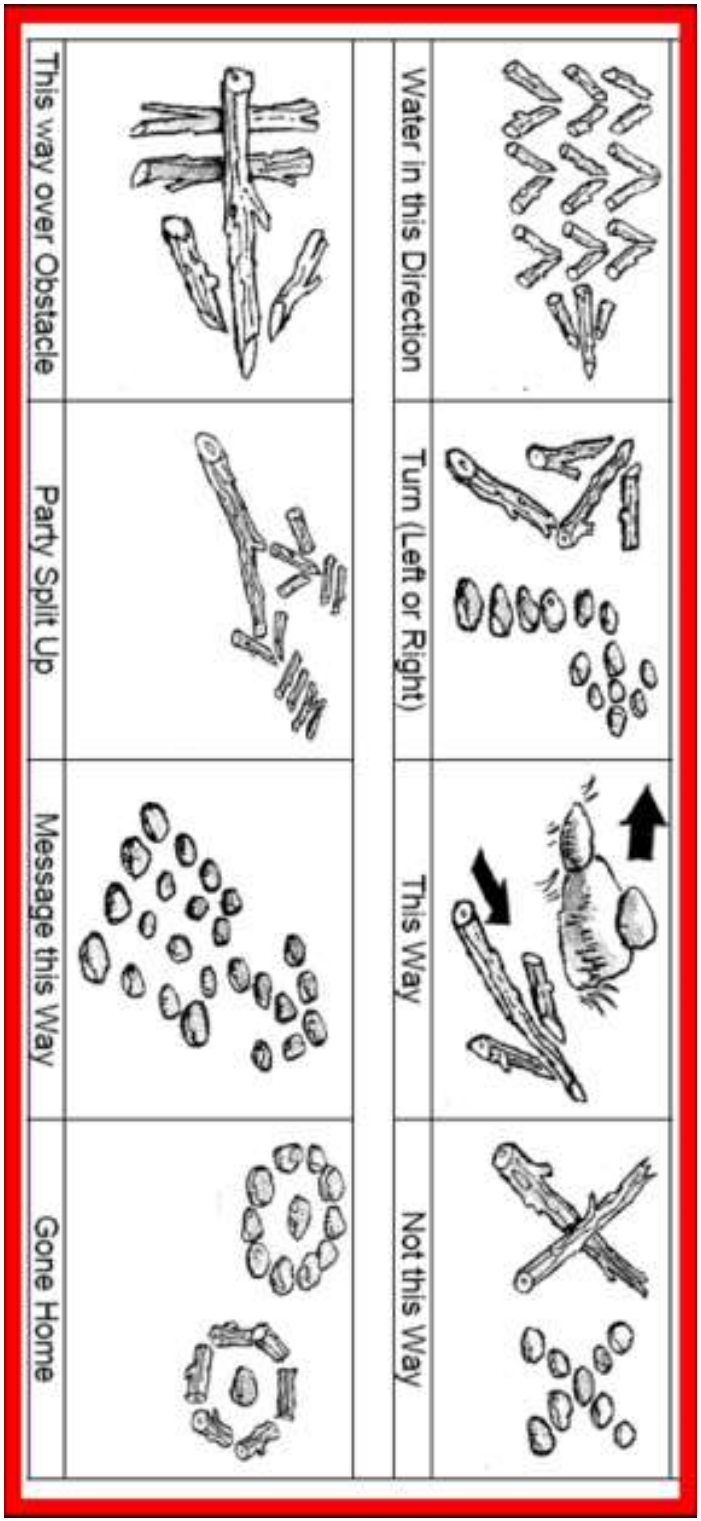

Always know where your buddy is and stay close. If your buddy leaves the water, you should leave as well until you are both ready to return.

- Each buddy is responsible for the other.
- If your buddy is having a problem, you must alert the leaders in charge.

Buddy checks When swimming, the leader or lifeguard may blow their whistle for a buddy check. All pairs should raise each other's hands to show that buddies have not split apart.

Paint the Lion Purple

"Paint the Lion Purple" is an annual awareness tradition started by Western Cape Scouts in 2013. Every Thursday evening during the month of October, Scouts, Cubs, Scouters, and supporters put on their bright purple Scout t-shirts and scarves to climb Lion's Head in Cape Town. As a sea of purple trickles up the mountain trail, it "paints" the iconic landmark purple, promoting the Scout brand, celebrating community, and showing the whole city the pride and energy of the Scouting movement!

A Story of Perseverance

Gather round, Cubs! Sit down on the fynbos, rest your legs, and look down at how far you've climbed today.

Up in these rugged mountains, where the air is fresh and the rocks meet the sky, lives Blinky, a young Cape Sugarbird with bright yellow feathers and a very long, delicate tail. Next to him on a sunny rock sits Snort, a chubby, cheerful Baboon Spider with eight hairy legs.

One cool morning, Blinky and Snort looked up at the very highest crag of Lemoenkop. "I want to see what the world looks like from up there!" chirped Blinky, flapping his wings. Snort tapped four of his eight feet in excitement. "I'm coming too! Eight legs are better than two wings!"

So off they went up the steep, stony trail. At first, it was pure fun. Blinky zipped through the air, and Snort scampered over the small pebbles. But halfway up, the mountain got tough. The wind picked up, blowing dust everywhere. Blinky's tiny wings felt like heavy sacks of flour, and Snort's eight little legs were so tired they felt like wobbly noodles.

Just then, a sleek, shadowy Cape Leopard named Luna padded out from behind a sugarbush. She stretched gracefully and looked down at the two panting little creatures. "Where are you two struggling off to?" Luna purred softly. "It's windy, it's steep, and you look completely exhausted. Why don't you turn around? There's a nice, quiet shadow under the bushes down below where you can sleep all afternoon."

Right then, a quiet little voice inside Blinky whispered, "The Leopard is right. My wings hurt. I want to give up."

And a voice inside Snort whispered, "My eight legs can't take another step. Let's go sleep under the bush."

That quiet little voice wasn't the Leopard—it was giving in to yourself. It's the lazy part of our minds that wants to quit the moment things get hard.

Blinky looked at Snort. Snort looked at Blinky. Snort shook his tiny hairy head and said, "No. I didn't come half this way just to turn back now."

Blinky took a big breath, tucked his long tail against the wind, and said, "One small flutter at a time!"

Snort didn't try to dash. He just moved one leg, then the next leg, then the next leg. Blinky didn't try to fly all the way to the top in one go—he just fluttered to the very next rock. Hop. Flutter. Step. Every time that lazy little voice whispered "Quit," they pushed it away and took just one more step together.

And then—Swoosh!

They scrambled over the last rock and stood right on the summit peak! The wind cooled their hot coats, and beneath them lay the entire ocean, the town, and the valley stretched out like a gigantic, beautiful map. The lower bushes down below looked so small, and they realized that if they had listened to that lazy voice, they would have missed the most amazing view in the world.

Look around you right now, Pack. As you climbed Lemoenkop today, your legs grew tired and your lungs puffed. That same quiet voice tried to whisper, "It's too steep, let's stop." But you didn't listen to the lazy voice. You chose perseverance, just like Blinky and Snort. Remember this summit whenever you face something hard in life. The tired feeling goes away, but the strength you build by not giving in stays with you forever.

Well done, Cubs! You conquered Lemoenkop!
